I see echoes of Swami Vivekananda's teaching in the work of Western social scientists like Pitirim Sorokin, a sociologist, who also emphasized that spiritual training is essential to the integration and growth of individuals, society, and culture, which in turn form an indivisible trinity Sorokin Swami Muktinathananda, a scientist, resided in Canada for many years, but ultimately he renounced the world and became a monk with the Ramakrishna Mission. When I get big ass short story collections I usually read a few in between novels, or I read one or two stories during my lunch breaks. Despite how different they all are, I adore that they have formed this kinship and care for one. He considers it to be the proper sphere of application for the natural sciences, and as such a valuable source of knowledge. This is just a terrific reflection.
